Notes re President's mtg w/ Andrew Glass (Page 4) from Harry McPherson:
Andrew Glass of the Washington Post came into talk to the President about the Johnson library at Austin. He is doing a story for the Washington Post on the Johnson library, obviously inspired by the recent Post controversy over the Kennedy School of Government at Harvard. Glass had been to Austin for four days talking to University officials and others concerned with the Johnson library. He asked the President whether any other sites had been considered for the library, and the President replied that consideration was given to a number of others, including Baylor, Johnson City, San Marcos, Syracuse University, and the Library of Congress. The President described the reasons for the ultimate selection of Austin--the University of Texas provided important collateral sources for scholarly use and that as Mrs. Johnson's and Lynda's alma mater it had strong personal claim on the affections of the Johnsons. The President said the importance of the library to him was principally that it would house papers going back 35 years and encompassing many of the important public events of our times. Glass told the President that he had found--to his
			q		xxxxx surprise--that there was no controversy over the library, no bad feelings or suspicion of any kind, and that he intended to write a story that would be favorable in tone.
