National Anthems

Except at outdoor functions where there may be troops and military bands, it is NOT recommended that the national anthem of the United States and the national anthem of the Republic of Korea be played unless the sponsoring organization is confident that the orchestra is able to play the anthem very well. It is not necessary to play the anthems at strictly social functions or at formal luncheons and dinners as frequently awkward situations and inconveniences are created. It is not the custom in Washington to play national anthems at State dinners. When the anthems are played, it is customary to play the anthem of the United States second.

Flags

When the flags of the United States and the Republic of Korea are used, consider the area where the flags are to be placed as a stage or focal point, then place the flag of the United States on the left as viewed from the audience, and the flag of the Republic of Korea on the right.

Background Notes

KOREA

Population: 27.5 million
Capital: Seoul

Korea is a mountainous peninsula about 600 miles long and 135 miles wide, located in north-eastern Asia and projecting southeast from Manchuria. Japan lies about 120 miles to the east on the other side of the Sea of Japan. To the west, and separated by the Yellow Sea, lies the coast of China.

Seoul, the capital of the Republic of Korea, is in the west central portion of the peninsula, less than 30 miles from the Demilitarized Zone separating Communist military forces from those of the U.N. Command. The city is inland on the Han River, which has its outlet into the Yellow Sea.

Rugged mountains and cliffs abound on the northern and eastern sides of the country, whereas the western and southern coasts have many good harbors. The climate in Seoul is hot and humid in summer. July and August are normally the warmest months, with temperatures reaching 95° F. Rainfall is concentrated in the summer months, the rainy season normally occurring in late June and July. Winters are cold and dry.

THE PEOPLE

The Korean population is racially one of the most homogeneous in the world. Its racial origins are obscure, but the primary stock is believed to be Tungusic, related to the Mongols with some Chinese mixture. According to the December 1960 official census, the Republic of Korea had a population of over 24.9 million. The present rate of population growth is about 2.9 percent per year. With approximately 700 persons per square mile, the Republic of Korea ranks with Japan and Taiwan in density of population.

The population is concentrated in the Seoul-Inchon area and in the fertile plains in the southern part of the country. The mountains and hill country are only sparsely inhabited. The largest city in the Republic of Korea is its capital, Seoul (commonly pronounced "sole") with an estimated 2.4 million inhabitants. The largest Korean minority abroad is in Japan, where there are almost 600,000 Korean residents. Other important Korean minorities are found in Manchuria and possibly the Soviet Union.

There are well over one million Christians—the largest percentage in any Far Eastern country except the Philippines—with about 242,000 Catholics, some 1,300,000 claimed Protestants (the majority of them Presbyterians and Methodists), and a few hundred Russian Orthodox adherents.

The traditional religions of Korea are Buddhism, Confucianism, and Shamanism. Meaningful figures on their adherents are not available. Buddhism has declined for some 550 years but is still a significant force. Its adherents are estimated at about 16 percent of the population. Shamanism, while little organized, is widely practiced. Confucianism is an important continuing cultural influence; but as a cult it is now weak, with adherents, by and large, only among the aged. There is a cult called Ch'ondokyo (Religion of the Heavenly Way), a native political religious group which gained prominence in the 19th century but is no longer an active religious force.

HISTORY

United in the 7th century A.D., Korea was a semi-independent state associated with China until annexed by Japan in 1910. After the capitulation of Japan in 1945, the Korean Peninsula was militarily divided between the United States and Soviet forces at the 38th parallel in order to accept the surrender of the Japanese forces stationed in Korea. A U.S. military government was established in the southern part, while the northern part was occupied by the U.S.S.R. Negotiations between the United States and the U.S.S.R. in 1946 and 1947 to unify Korea failed because the Soviet Government refused to permit free consultations with representatives of all groups of the Korean people in setting up a national government.

The Republic of Korea was established in the area south of the 38th parallel on August 15, 1948, under U.N. auspices, since the Communists refused to permit U.N.-supervised elections in North Korea. The Soviets, in turn, established the "Democratic People's Republic of Korea" in September of that year.

U.S. military forces were withdrawn from Korea in 1949 and on June 25, 1950, the North Korean Communists invaded the Republic of Korea. The United Nations engaged in the first collective defense action under its charter when 16 of its members, including the United States, sent troops and assistance to Korea to resist the aggression. Chinese Communist forces entered the conflict on the side of the aggressors in late October 1950. Hostilities were terminated by an armistice agreement on July 27, 1953. Since the armistice the Republic of Korea has been devoting its primary efforts to rebuilding its economy and strengthening its defense forces.

POLITICAL DEVELOPMENTS

President Syngman RHEE dominated the Korean political scene until his resignation on April 27, 1960. Korean politics were strongly centralized, with the Executive dominating the national government and the government heavily influencing all aspects of Korean society. Two major political parties developed: the Liberal Party, organized and headed by President Rhee, and the opposition Democratic Party formed in 1955, which was headed in its later years by CHANG Myon, who was elected Vice President in 1956. Both parties were conservative and friendly to the United States.

From 1958 on, the Liberal Party administration under President Rhee resorted to increasingly coercive and unpopular measures to maintain its control. Blatant election rigging in 1960 led to nation-wide demonstrations and riots against the Rhee government in March and April, forcing the President to resign on April 27.

Interim Government

Under the interim government of HO Chung, the National Assembly revised the constitution to provide for a parliamentary form of government and conducted orderly and free elections in which the former opposition Democratic Party won an overwhelming victory. CHANG Myon became Prime Minister. Because of deep-rooted factionalism, however, the Democratic Party split in late 1960, when over 60 members formed the New Democratic Party under the leadership of President YUN Po-son.

Although a number of badly needed social and economic reforms were undertaken, lack of firm leadership and constant political turmoil in the legislature compounded the difficulties of the government, and by the end of 1960 there was increasing talk of the need for strong leadership to cope with these problems.

Military Junta

On May 16, 1961, a military coup d'etat was carried out by about 300 field-grade officers and a few general officers supported by approximately 4,000 troops. Key government installations were seized within hours, and a few days later control of the entire country was assured, since the Chang administration gave no effective resistance.

The original small military junta expanded to a 31-man military committee—Supreme Council for National Reconstruction (SCNR)—which became the supreme executive and legislative body. The legislature was dissolved. Military officers assumed the main executive and administrative offices throughout the central and local governments. Upon seizing power the military coup leaders pledged to oppose communism, adhere to the United Nations, respect all international treaties and agreements, eliminate corruption, and solve the basic economic problems of the country. Later in 1961 General PARK Chung Hee, chairman of the military junta, promised that representative civilian government would be restored in 2 years.

In preparation for the return to civilian government a new constitution was established by popular referendum in December 1962. It provided for a strong presidential system, with a prime minister, a cabinet responsible to the president, and a unicameral legislature. The constitution also provided for an independent judiciary.

Presidential and National Assembly elections were held in October and November 1963 respectively. PARK Chung Hee was elected President with 43 percent of the popular vote, and his Democratic-Republican Party won an overwhelming majority of the 175 seats in the legislature with only 34 percent of the popular vote. Most observers, including the U.N. Commission for the Unification and Rehabilitation of Korea, acclaimed the elections as being orderly and fair. A supra-partisan cabinet was formed in late December and the new government was inaugurated on December 17, 1963.

Park Chung Hee Administration

The new administration announced it would continue the basic economic and social programs initiated by the military junta. It has laid particular stress on establishing normal relations with Japan and improving its foreign trade position. A series of student demonstrations in early 1964 eventually forced President Park to reshuffle his cabinet on May 11 and finally to declare emergency martial law in Seoul on June 3. Martial law in the capital city was lifted July 29 following a compromise agreement with the Opposition.

ECONOMY

Although its war-shattered economy has been largely restored, Korea still faces numerous grave economic problems. It is poor in natural resources; possesses a dense, poverty-ridden population; suffers from a low level of technical and managerial proficiency; and is burdened with the support of one of the world's largest military establishments. The Republic of Korea desires to broaden its economic base and expand production to feed, clothe, and provide other necessities for its population. It has the great asset of an intelligent, industrious people with a high literacy rate and a strong sense of national identity.

The estimated per capita gross national product is still less than $100 despite an advance of 5.8 percent in the GNP during 1963. The expected continuance of a gradual decline in U.S. aid will heighten the need for increased domestic savings and investment and controlled consumption, if any significant growth in GNP is to be sustained.

Agriculture, forestry, and fishing account for over one-third of the GNP, and manufacturing and construction contribute 22 percent. Only 21 percent of Korea's land is arable, and 80 percent of the cultivated area is in grain. Total agricultural production is inadequate to meet the country's needs and must be supplemented with U.S. surplus foods and fibers. Rice is the principal crop, barley ranking second.

Korea's mineral resources include coal (medium to low-grade anthracite), tungsten, graphite, and iron ore. There are no known resources of petroleum. Coal production has increased sharply in recent years and provides much of the nation's fuel requirements. Industrial output has been increasing steadily but not yet at a rate which appreciably improves employment opportunities for Korea's fast-growing labor force, one-third of which is unemployed or underemployed.

Faced with economic, military, and political problems of such magnitude, the Republic of Korea has experienced a chronic and severe imbalance of internal and external payments. Commodity exports have more than doubled since 1959, amounting to $87 million in 1963; and other receipts, largely from goods and services sold to the U.N. forces stationed in Korea, provide additional foreign exchange earnings of about $100 million annually. Nevertheless, the trade gap is enormous—over $300 million in 1963—and can be financed only partially by Korea's own resources. Substantial foreign aid is essential to sustain the populace, maintain the armed forces, and support the economic development effort.

The necessity of maintaining a large military force regularly drains upwards of one-third of the central government budget, even though about two-thirds of the defense budget is financed by counterpart funds generated by the sale of aid goods, including U.S. agricultural commodities under P.L. 480, Title I. The prospect of diminishing grant aid poses a serious problem for the Korean Government, especially when coupled with the strain upon sparse domestic resources represented in undertaking a program of long-range development, to which the government is committed. In these circumstances the most careful financial management is required to contain inflationary movements, which during 1963 constituted a serious threat to the nation's economic stability. To deal with this problem the Korean Government has adopted a comprehensive economic stabilization program calling for a balanced budget, ceilings on monetary and credit expansion, and import controls.

In addition, the Korean Government has undertaken a series of other specific economic reforms which, if successfully implemented, will eliminate a number of distortions which have plagued the domestic economy and handicapped Korea's competitive position in the export market. These reforms include devaluation of the currency by nearly 50 percent—from 130 won per dollar to 255, effective May 3, 1964, upward revisions of public utility and transportation rates, administrative improvements in the electric power industry, more adequate pay and other improvements in the civil service, reform of the taxation system and tax collection procedures, and institution of public works programs.

During the first half of 1964 industrial production and exports achieved record high levels, the price spiral slowed down, the largest postwar barley crop was harvested, and prospects were good for a better than average fall rice crop. Despite formidable problems the outlook for Korea's continued progress is encouraging, particularly if sound fiscal and monetary policies are pursued and if the political situation is stable.

KOREAN NATIONAL POLICIES

A primary objective of the Republic of Korea has been the unification of the Korean Peninsula under the principles of freedom and democracy. This aim has been frustrated because of Communist intransigence, and Korea remains divided by the Demilitarized Zone established by the armistice agreement. Although the Republic of Korea has opposed, and did not sign, the armistice agreement between the Communists and the U.N. Command, it has abided by its provisions.

A second major objective of the Republic of Korea is national economic development, both to achieve a better living for its people and to gain a more secure position in the community of nations. A team of industrial engineers and financial experts, financed by the United States, is advising the Korean Government in formulating a program for long-range economic development. The Korean Government wants and needs foreign private investment and has enacted liberal legislation to induce private foreign capital.

Another important objective has been to achieve security from foreign aggression in the future. Because of the continued threat posed by large Communist military forces in North Korea as well as the proximity of powerful forces in Soviet Russia and Communist China, the Korean Government has consistently urged the continuance of the presence of substantial U.S. military forces in Korea as well as large-scale economic and military aid. U.S. recognition of this need for military security is embodied in the U.S.-Korea mutual defense treaty which entered into force in November 1954. It provides that the parties will consult with each other if either is threatened by external attack and that an armed attack on the territories under the administrative control of either side in the Pacific area would be dangerous to the peace and safety of the other.

Foreign Relations

Foreign relations of the Republic of Korea are characterized by close ties with the United States and determined efforts to establish diplomatic relations with other nations of the free world. Korea now has diplomatic relations with over 60 free-world nations as compared to 16 during the Rhee administration. The Republic of Korea has sought membership in the United Nations—which the Soviet Union has repeatedly vetoed—and is a member of 12 U.N. specialized agencies and the International Atomic Energy Agency. The Republic of Korea and Japan are negotiating a settlement of outstanding issues such as Korean claims growing out of the Japanese occupation of Korea, fisheries, and the status of Korean residents of Japan. Much progress has been made recently and the outlook for a settlement in 1964 is good.

U.S. POLICY

The United States seeks under the principles of self-determination a free, independent, and democratic Korea, peacefully unified through elections under U.N. supervision, with a National Assembly in which representation is proportionate to the indigenous population. Pending achievement of this objective, which has been obstructed by the Communists who reject the competence of the United Nations to deal with the problem, the United States seeks to strengthen and support the Republic of Korea so that it may achieve reasonable security against a renewal of Communist aggression and so that it may attain economic viability. The U.S. Government has noted with approval the pledges announced by the Korean Government which express support for free-world principles and a determination to promote the welfare of the Korean people in accordance with these principles. The United States continues to cooperate with the Korean Government in the promotion of the well-being and strength of Korea and its people. The United States also desires to strengthen the ties binding the Republic of Korea to the nations of the free world.

His Excellency Chung Hee PARK
President of the Republic of Korea

Republic of Korea

President Park was born on September 30, 1917, the youngest son of a farming family in the village of Kumi, near Taegu in North Kyongsang province. He graduated from the Kumi Primary School in 1931 and from Taegu Normal School in 1937. In December 1964 the eldest of Park's four brothers, Tong-hui, at the age of 72 was still living in the parental home near Taegu.

He began his army career in 1940 in Manchuria and served as a lieutenant with the Japanese Army after graduating from the Japanese Military Academy in 1944. In 1946 he was commissioned in the Korean Constabulary, and thereafter rose through the ranks of the Republic of Korea Army. His service fell roughly into three phases: staff positions as executive officer, commander of artillery units, and division and corps commands.

As a result of the May 16, 1961 military revolution, then Major General Park became leader of the military government. After winning the October 15, 1963 Presidential election, President Park assumed his present office December 17, 1963 for a four year term.

President Park was married in 1951 and has three children, two girls and a boy aged 13, 10, and 6, respectively. His foreign travel includes three trips to the United States, in 1954, 1961, and 1963, and a state visit to West Germany in December 1964. President Park speaks limited English and is fluent in Japanese.

May 6, 1965

Mrs. Chung Hee PARK
