

- everything will be okay again! If there isn't - perhaps I'd better stop writing so much and often.

Well, you're hung, twice. In little black frames in my room - Arrogance and you and Melly. I am terrifically proud of you and look at them every time I come in the room!

Lyndon, I had my picture made today for you. I'd always shout as soon meet the firing squad at dawn or sit down in front of that black hooded thing and grimace for a half hour or so. I warn you - they will be awful. But I just couldn't bear to wait any longer.

I meant to have them made without fail at Bachrach's in Dallas

Wednesday Nite

Dearest Lyndon -

Out one window

I can see the moon rising - yellow behind a mass of black clouds. And from another I can see lightning flash across a dark ominous sky. The thunder is growling all around. I do wish we'd have a storm! I adore them!

Well, today passed without any letter at all from you. I could scarcely believe it when I arrived home from Shreveport, all eager to see what you'd say today and there was - nothing. (Incidentally, I feel very disgusted at having written you two letters yesterday)... But if there is a sweet one tomorrow,

Oct. 13 but I couldn't find a new dress I liked anywhere and my old clothes I took gave me an inferiority complex and a down-trodden look out of the eye. So I waited...
But I decided you might want me to hurry up, so this morning I hied forth to Shrew-port, which affords only fair-to-middlin' photographers... (I carried a little cotton dress to have some made in — I because you liked me in them.) Proofs will be sent to me Monday and I shall mail them (if they're good enough) on to you to choose from.

Lincoln Stephens is the most adorable fellow — especially when he is little. I wish I could read it to you. Sometimes, when we are together, I want to read you some of the things I like especially. Shall we?

Goodnight, and many kisses to the one I love most,
— and many ardent wishes for the day when I shall see you again. When will it be?

Devotedly, Bird
